Campbell's Bill Aims to Prevent Future "Lure of Vainglory or Lust for Power."

Author of Measure Says Foreign Potentates Used Wiles on Wilson.

Special Despatch to THE SUN.
WASHINGTON, July 9.—That "neither valuglory nor lust for power will again lead the President of the United States to leave his own country and seat of Government to engage in political controversies with the statesmen and diplomats of other lands beyond the seas," a bill was introduced to-day by Representa tive Campbell (Kan.), chairman of the Rules Committee, making it "unlawful for the President of the United States during the term of his office to absent himself from the territorial jurisdiction of the United States or to perform the duties of his office at any other place than at the seat of Government."

The bill, which seeks to amend the act of July 16, 1750, was accompanied by a satirical excoriation of President Wilson's metrices, actions and accomplishments during the Peace Conferences in the form of a statement. Mr. Campbell was unable to obtain unanimous consent to make the actions and accompetition of the United States to leave his own prestige and that of his country. It will require the work of years to restore the Government and the people of the United States to their former cordial and congenial relationship with the other countries of the world with whose people the President has recently come in contact. "We cannot retrieve the past, we can only guard the future. If this bill shall become a law neither value of the United States to leave his own of the United States to their former cordial and congenial relationship with the other countries of the work of years to restore the Government and the people of the United States to their former cordial and congenial relationship with the other countries of the work of years to restore the Government and the people of the United States to their former cordial and congenial relationship with the other countries of the work of years to restore the Government and the people of the United States to their former cordial and congenial relationship with the other countries of the work of years to restore the Government and the people of the United States to their former cordial and congenial relationship with the other countries of the work of years to restore the Government and the people of the United States to their former cordial and congenial relationship with the other countries of the work of years to restore the Government and the people of the United States to their former cordial and congenial relationship with the other c the House because of calendar Wednes-

The statement is as follows: the office of the President of the United States is the most powerful office in the world. The duties and responsibilities resting upon the President call upon him to make many sacrifices and to forego

"He cannot gratify all his personal wishes nor his desires for foreign travel. He must lay aside every ambition for the applause of any people except the people of his own country. He must smother every hope for honor beyond the Presidency of the United States. "The President must remain in the country whose servant he is. He cannot freely mingle with the people of other lands without endangering his own prestige and inviting trouble for the Government and people of his own country. "The Presidency carries with it such great power that artful diplomats and international statesmen in other lands should not be tempted to beguile the President with unusual attentions, courtesles and presents to exercise his power for the welfare of other people than those of the United States. "The President wanted a League of Nations. It was given to him. Those who sat with him at the peace table wanted to add more territory to their domains; wanted more friendly harbors at the doors of teeming millions at the ends of the paths they controlled on the seas; wanted dominion and control over smaller and weaker nations; wanted insmaller and weaker nations; wanted in-demnity for the losses they sustained in war; wanted security and prestige for war; wanted security and prestige for the Government and people for future years and wanted the United States to share the burden of policing Europe and maintaining the boundaries of their nations and they got what they wanted.

The Housing Problem

The housing problem is a simple one and is governed entirely by economic laws.

It merely requires money for buying the land and building the housen. Money is furnished, the larger part by lenders, the balance by the builders and owners. It it is offered a antistactory return, it will be forthcoming.

The lender has to be astisfied by a sufficient rate of interest, the owner and builder by the prospect of a sufficient profit on his investment.

He will not borrow the money nor put up an additional amount of his own unless he can make a fair profit on both sums.
